RESEARCH INTERESTS

Political violence, paramilitarism and armed citizenship in Ireland, 1909–1916; the state and private management of violence and policing; youth organisations and the pedagogy of militarism; Italian migration to Ireland from the nineteenth century to the present; comparative and global approaches to social protest and collective violence.

CURRENT RESEARCH PROJECT

Before the Revolution: Armed Citizenship and Civil Militarism in Modern Ireland. Scholarship on the decade before 1916 has concentrated almost entirely on explicitly political, insurgent or illegal armed organisations, reading violence through the lenses of revolution, sectarian conflict and state repression. This project shifts attention to the cultural, legal and social substratum that made armed practices intelligible, legitimate and socially embedded before they became associated with insurgency: the civilian rifle clubs, shooting associations, cadet formations and voluntary training organisations active in Ireland between 1900 and 1925 — neither clandestine militias nor purely recreational bodies, but organisations embedded in schools, sporting cultures, patriotic associations and projects of physical and moral improvement. The distinction between legitimate and illegitimate armed organisation was rarely fixed in advance: it was politically negotiated, legally contested and administratively redefined in response to shifting anxieties about loyalty, citizenship, public order and national security. The project combines archival research, legislative history, social and cultural history, prosopography and digital methods, and sets the Irish case alongside the civil-militarism movements studied for Britain, France, Germany, Switzerland and Italy.
